General Information

Providing such property carries inherent risks. For instance, an employee could damage or lose the property. This could lead to disputes about who is liable for the loss or damage, and the extent to which that person is liable.

This policy sets out the responsibilities of employees who have been given access to, or use of, property belonging to the employer. In summary, the policy requires employees to exercise care over the property and to return property on termination of employment or at any other time as directed by the employer.

Limitations

In New South Wales, the Employees Liability Act 1991 ('the Act') limits the circumstances on which an employer may recoup losses from employees. The Act prohibits an employer from requiring an employee to indemnify the employer where the employee commits a tort (i.e. a civil wrong) for which the employer is also liable. However, circumstances involving serious and wilful misconduct, and/or circumstances which do not arise out of the employee's employment are not included in this protection.

For instance, where an employee causes a motor vehicle accident in the course of employment (and the accident was not caused due to the employee's serious and wilful misconduct), the employer cannot require the employee to indemnify the employer for the loss caused.

If you are unsure about whether you can require employees to indemnify the employer in certain circumstances, we recommend you seek advice from a workplace lawyer.
